INTRODUCTION

This publication is a directory of the major hospital resources available in the United States for the care of tuberculosis patients. It gives the name, location and the number of beds that were available in the institutions surveyed on June 30, 1967.

The total number of beds reported for tuberculosis patients in the United States is given in the following table. Non-Federal hospitals with less than 10 beds set aside for tuberculosis, and beds in mental and penal institutions, are not included in this report.

¹With 10 or more tuberculosis beds.

Non-Federal institutions which have reduced their tuberculosis bed complement to less than 10 tuberculosis beds since 1965, the last reporting date, are not included. Federal hospitals include all available tuberculosis beds reported by the United States Public Health Service, Division of Indian Health, Department of the Air Force, Department of the Army, Department of the Navy and the Veterans Administration.

Tables 2 and 3 show the change in the number of hospitals providing tuberculosis care, their rated capacity and the number of tuberculosis beds occupied for the United States since 1961. Table 7 reflects this information by state for the non-Federal hospitals. There has been a decrease of 78 non-Federal hospitals or 22.6 percent since 1961. Numerous hospitals have discontinued service for the care of tuberculosis patients: some have been closed in their entirety; others converted to chronic, mental, other chest diseases, and treatment of alcoholics.

*Only hospitals with 10 or more TB beds were reported in 1961. The difference in the basis of reporting "Rated Capacity" and "Beds Occupied" in 1961 is not significant (0.1%).

The utilization of tuberculosis beds in non-Federal hospitals was 71 percent in 1967. Since 1948, utilization of tuberculosis hospital beds has shown a steady decline.

Table 4 provides some measure of the extent and range in utilization of beds in these hospitals. There is an apparent relationship between the size of a hospital and the level of utilization although no clear pattern is in evidence. In order to bring this relationship into focus, the following broad classifications of hospitals as to size and level of utilization were made:

Level of utilization: 60% and over under 40%

Size of hospital: Large—200 beds and over
Medium—50 to 199 beds
Small—under 50 beds

On the basis of the above classifications, 80 percent of the large hospitals, 70 percent of the medium size ones and 62 percent of the small hospitals maintained or exceeded a utilization level of 60 percent. At the other end of the scale, the low utilization of tuberculosis beds in small hospitals is quite pronounced. Only 4 percent of the large hospitals and 8 percent of the medium size ones failed to attain 40 percent utilization. Almost one-fourth (23%) of the small hospitals fell below this level.
